he is in the same tradition as the other great Jewish rationalists

By Robert New England

Gersonides, also known as the Rambam, wrote this work of Jewish philosophy, synthesizing rabbinic Judaism with the rationalist philosophy of Aristotle. In this broad sense, he is in the same tradition as the other great Jewish rationalists, such as Maimonides (Rambam.)

This book is an English translation of Sefer Milhamot Ha-Shem, ("The Wars of the Lord"). It is modeled after Maimonides' Guide for the Perplexed.

Gersonides explains his disagreements with some elements of Maimonides' syncretism of Aristotelianism and rabbinic Jewish thought, and offers his own alternatives. His book includes discussions of:

1. the doctrine of the soul, in which Gersonides defends the theory of impersonal reason as mediating between God and man. He explains the formation of the higher reason (or acquired intellect, as it was called) in humanity—his view being thoroughly realist and resembling that of Avicenna;
2. prophecy
3. God's knowledge of facts and providence, in which is advanced the theory that God does not know individual facts. While there is general providence for all, special providence only extends to those whose reason has been enlightened;

4. celestial substances, the spiritual hierarchy which the Jewish philosophers of the middle ages accepted, and also giving, along with astronomical details, some astrological theory.

5. rationalist views creation and miracles,
